The Railway That Never Was

In the summer of 2016, transportation historian Peter Hammond of Norway spoke on one of the most interesting moments of Waterford history—the “Fear and Fighting on the Oxford Central Railway,” as outlined by Lowell D. Henley in 1978 issues of BitterSweet magazine. The story can also be found in the second Waterford history book.

Peter Hammond

In 1896 a group of local businessmen and farmers, spurred on by Auburn salesman Eugene W. Eastman, began to organize a new electric railway. It was planned to start at the Grand Trunk station in Norway (near today's fire station), run toward Norway Center and to Rice's Junction (today the intersection of Rtes. 118 & 37), then branch off toward North Waterford, Stoneham and Lovell or toward South Waterford and Harrison. At least, that was the plan.

Though there were doubters, it seemed a viable commercial enterprise. The Advertiser estimated there were already more than 6,000 tons of freight each year being sent by teams from Waterford alone. Among the local men who met to survey and capitalize the route were Melville Monroe, William Watson, James Brown and George Marr. There was an offer to go the other way and take their business to Port-

Waterford Fire History

At the October meeting, former Assistant Chief Bill Haynes presented a brief history of the town fire department with a PowerPoint slide show and Society President Ted Gerber offered a history of the evolution of firefighting in the United States, which included a display of several vintage helmets from his personal collection.

This year marks the 20th anniversary of the dedication of the “new” fire station at the top of Town Farm Hill. It is also the 70th anniversary of the creation or reestablishment of the three fire associations that formed the foundation for half a century of firefighting in Waterford before merging into a unified department. Those associations in the south, north and Flat took on new life after veterans returned home after WWII and served their communities faithfully for nearly 50 years.

In the early 1990s, fire department leaders began looking at consolidation and the possible construction of a new central fire station. After a series of meetings, the associations agreed to dissolve and turn over their assets to the town in an equipment account. At the March 4, 1995 town meeting, voters approved the construction of the municipal complex on a 13-acre parcel owned by Tim and Todd Sawyer, which was traded for a similar sized town-owned piece on Plummer Hill. John Tucker headed up the committee and also served as Clerk of the Works during the construction.

Above is the Beech Hill house from "Echoes" issue 61 identified by Harvey Lord in a letter sent from his new home in Bow, N.H.:

"Regarding 'unknown house' on Beech Hill: I knew it back in the 30s and 40s as home of Maude Kittredge and her children, Arthur (Bow), Lillian (who later married Lawrence Herrick of North Waterford), Herbert, Ella (who later married "Winnie" Rolfe) and Henry (who was in my class at North Waterford Elementary School.) Ella and Henry were friends of [my] brother Kurt and me.

"There was a deteriorating barn in those days. I do not know if Maude was a widow or divorced. There was no man living there. Evelyn Beyer (from I don't know when) purchased the farm and invested a lot of $ to bring it up to better shape sometime during or immediately after World War II. Apparently she also had the barn torn down... Farm is on the road running from 'Valley Road' to Blackguard Road."

Acknowledgements

The trustees have been very busy this year. New weather-resistant benches which can be left out for the winter have been assembled on the common by Tony, Ralph and Henry. Joy has been extremely busy doing research for a church celebration and she has brought to us from Joan Fillebrown many, many church records which will now reside in one of our fireproof files. Thank you, everyone!

Ted Gerber and Bill Haynes contributed interesting stories to a program on fire departments and Bob Spencer has been doing a lot of research with David Sanderson on our manufactories, including Stanwood Bucket Factory, which we will feature next summer.

The former site of the Carding Mill, which today is at Old Sturbridge Village, will soon be identified by an historical marker. Above, carding mill pond ca. 1930.

Nuances

Six degrees of Connection

by Nancy Chute Marcotte

In our files I found a delightful picture of six women in rigid corsets and very similar hairstyles, seated in front of a white clapboard house. Aunt Flora Abbott's handwriting labelled them "The Stanwood Sisters," so I assumed that was "the Stanwood House" at the top of the hill above South Waterford Village on the Sweden Road.

One of the reasons I call this column "Nuances" is because of the subtle connections I so often stumble upon in our collection. The picture in the Fall/Winter 2015 "Echoes" of the changed Parker House at 10 Mill Hill Road mentioned Eugene Nelson and F. A. Noble, who owned that hotel in the late 19th century.

Separately and completely by chance, I received some genealogical information about Eugene Nelson, a manufacturer born in Waterford who was descended from "one of the oldest families in New England." Thomas Nelson had been one of twenty-seven friends who "emigrated with Rev. Ezekiel Rogers" from Rowley, Yorkshire, England in 1638 to "Mr. Rogers' Plantation" (later Rowley), Massachusetts.

Eugene's grandparents, Moses and Hitta Pingree Nelson, came to Temple Hill, Waterford in 1817 from Rowley, Mass. Their son, Chaplin Nelson (m. Emily Hicks) was a surveyor who later had a general merchandise store. Chaplin died young and his wife married Mr. D. W. Noble, thus connecting those two families. Eugene had two brothers—Llewelyn, who went to Leadville, Colorado, and Charles, a railroad man in New York City; his sister Georgia married Mr. Cyrus Tucker of Norway.

Now, Eugene at age nineteen went to Boston to be a clerk in the water works for a year; then he returned to manufacture "woodenware" and later took up market gardening in his home town. In 1871 he wed Miss Lottie (Charlotte) Stanwood, the Boston-born daughter of Albert & Charlotte Matilda Morse Stanwood. The Nelsons had five children: Albert, Edward, Ethel, Bertha and Charles. (Some of us remember Charles and his wife Florence in the Nelson house in later years.) The Nelson and Stanwood houses were understandably across the road from each other. Today the Nelson house is owned by John and Regan Martin and the other is owned by Jackie Holmberg of Titusville, Florida.

Eugene was known as an active Democrat and he was Supt. Of Schools for several years. His fine Mansard house had been built by Danleys c. 1850 and was altered in the late Victorian era. The big Federal Stanwood farmhouse was built by William Morse c. 1810 and was used for a time as a hotel. The Stanwoods probably used it in the summer.

Albert Stanwood, of Bucket Factory fame, had grown up in Newburyport and worked for thirty-six years at Boston water works; he built the Chestnut Hill Reservoir while Superintendent of the water dept. His wife Charlotte was the daughter of innkeepers William and Charlotte Jewell Morse and must have inherited the house. There were nine Stanwood children.

Two sons were both named Albert (one died at age 4 in 1852 and the second was born in 1861, moved "west" and had a lumber business.) Their first daughter, Catherine, died at age 2; then came six other girls: Charlotte (married Eugene Nelson); Catherine (m. [1] Lucius Abbott, [2] T. W. Hardy of Dedham, Mass.); Florence (married Frank A. Noble—aha! The Parker House); Adeline (married Edward Billings of Framingham, Mass.); Emma (married Albert Murphy of Detroit, Michigan); and Alice (m. Bell?).

There are more things to be learned but now I have so much more to think about as I gaze at the six lovely Stanwood sisters.

NEXT SUMMER

Future issues of the "Echoes" will feature the Stanwood Bucket Factory as we look at the second in our series of Waterford manufactories. The former site of the Carding Mill, which is today in Old Sturbridge Village, will be identified with an historical marker sometime this year. Bob Spencer and David Sanderson have done a lot of research for programs on our mills.

Oxford Central Electric Railway

land via Bridgton but there was already established a substantial teamster route to Norway and Paris.

Rice's Junction would be the location for a power house, with two steam generators and four boilers planned. Stations were outlined for Norway Lake Village, Norway Center, East Waterford, Bisbeetown, Lynchville, East Stoneham, Waterford Flat (though there was opposition to this), South Waterford and Harrison. The South Waterford stop would be near all the mills—about where Kimballs' store is today—and W. K. Hamlin's creamery, as he was shipping award-winning butter all over the country.

The proposed route was relatively flat and about 26 miles long. The Grand Trunk Railroad offered special rates. The cars would carry a combination of passengers, mail and freight. In January, 1897, 1,000 shares of stock went on sale for $100 each. The cost of building the railway was estimated at $55,000.

In April, 1897, Railway Treasurer Judge S. S. Stearns received permission from the State Railroad Commission in Augusta and a head office was set up at Freeland Howe's in Norway. Among the seven directors chosen were A. S. Hapgood and B. G. McIntire of Waterford, Jonathan Bartlett of Stoneham and L. H. Burnham of Albany. Late in the summer, actual construction began.

On August 3rd there was a meeting at the Beals House hotel in Norway; by August 13th there were 125 Italian workers from the Boston construction firm O'Brien & Davis camped near Norway Center. They moved quickly with grading and stringing electric poles, working in three crews of 40 men each. By August 27th timbers and iron rails had been delivered. By September there were 237 men and they had reached Rice's Junction. That's when the trouble began.

The "Eyetalian War"

On Friday, September 5th, the Italian workers expected to be paid but there was no money. On Saturday, the work ceased and the crowd turned into a mob, armed with knives and revolvers. They took three hostages: foreman Robert Davis, Timekeeper James Hallett and sutler (provisioner) Felix Certosimo. The Italian Certosimo convinced them to take him into Norway to see about funds; he slipped away and escaped on a train back to Boston. Hallett ran into the woods, evaded pursuers, and hid in Norway. The mob got angrier at losing their hostages.

State Detective Bassett arrived with Chief Engineer Louis B. Wilson and Wilson was taken hostage, too. Assorted sheriffs and deputies from neighboring towns came to survey the situation. Local people sat up all night, armed with rifles and shotguns. The Norway Militia company was alerted. On Sunday Rev. Fr. M. D. Summa, who spoke Italian, was brought in to negotiate but that didn't help. Meantime one of the contractors arrived from Boston but said the money was tied up in a bank. The workers declared they would cut the hostages into as many pieces as the dollars they were owed ($2,300.)

The Norway station of the spur of the Grand Trunk Railroad along Beal St., ca. 1920. The shoe shop in the background is on the current location of the town's municipal offices and fire station. This railroad station has been replaced by apartment buildings. The train used to stop here to be unloaded and then would back up to South Paris.

Bassett and another detective, Wormell, conceived a rescue plot worthy of a movie. They arrived with two carriages and good horses aimed at North Waterford. Hostages jumped into the wagons and raced away. Bassett was injured as he shot at workers who suffered wounds and a broken leg. He escaped through the woods to Waterford Flat. Though rumors persisted for years that two of the rioters had been killed and buried, there was never any proof of that.

After a tense night when watchmen patrolled the streets and electric lights ran all hours in Norway, on Monday some of the rioters gave up and came into town, promising to stay there until they got their money; by Tuesday, most of the Italian laborers were in Norway. Sympathetic townspeople fed them and let them sleep in the Town Hall.

By Thursday, the laborers had all gone back to Boston on the train. In one month they had graded 17 miles for the track, built culverts and stacked ties. No one knows what happened to the carloads of steel rails or the funding of the company. The stocks were worthless. The railway was never built and no explanation can be found among newspaper archives. Thus ended the "Eyetalian War."

In 2016, you can still see part of a graded terrace, which runs across the snowmobile trail in back of Springer's Store in East Waterford. The 1976 history tells of other traces which can still be seen nearby. We can now be grateful that the commercial enterprise of an electric railway never cut a swath through the beautiful middle of Waterford Flat or out along the Bear Pond or Pa-poose Pond roads.

WATERFORD FIRE DEPARTMENT

“This is probably the biggest project the town has done next to the school,” said Tucker, whose yeoman effort steered months of research, study and planning leading up to the town meeting vote. “We haven’t found another site that is more centrally located,” the retired sea captain said, adding that the site puts the entire town within a three-mile radius of the new station.

In approving the project, voters also authorized a $400,000 bond for the project. An anticipated $250,000 was awarded in August, 1995, which changed the direction of the project. Acceptance of the grant meant acceptance of federal compliance rules. While increasing the cost of the project, the overall benefit was huge and the town was able to pay off all indebtedness in three years. Today, the municipal complex stands as a model of community cooperation, initiative and ingenuity.
